LEARNING OBJECTIVES / GOALS / OUTCOMES / LEARNING OUTCOMES:

Students will gain an awareness of the variety of migrant groups to Canada from the seventeenth century to the present, and the circumstances that spurred such migrations. While Canadians are often self-congratulatory about their country's tradition of toleration and acceptance, a closer examination of the past might challenge this view. The study of migration is a growing interdisciplinary academic field, and students will learn about some of the most important approaches and challenges to traditional views.
Much of the reading for this course will be done on a "collective" basis. Individual students will assume responsibility for specific readings, and will share their findings with the group. The course will help refine students' skills in oral presentation, discussion, and critical thinking. In addition, good writing skills and research will be emphasized.

METHODS:

Lecture, discussion of readings, film, presentations, composition, and examination.
